How can someone start over after a few years of hiatus with a new name and never talk about the past?

With a stubborn streak and a handful of newly written songs, that's what Walker Caine set out to do and found himself in the process.

With a used Jeep Cherokee packed with a handful of equipment and an old Washburn 12-String, he proceeded to put on over 70,000 miles on a self-designed tour starting with every little club or grill that would have him.

A year into breathing new life, he self-released the CD entitled "EP-1 unplugged"; a solo acoustic effort recorded in his living room. Back on the road, just under a year later he made a series of trips half-way across the country to recruit old friends and band members to record what became a largely impromptu studio recording entitled "Soft Shoulder".

After a world tour with the band, Walker began touring the U.S. on motorcycle with the help of others to get the equipment there and later pulling a small trailer with enough to set-up in small towns as he passes through. 200,000 miles later, he's still spends months riding the back-roads of America each year. He's the only national/international artist to do this.

Self described as folk music gone metal, Walker Caine is a new breed of Southern Rock as a band, and brings country and folk alive in a whole different fashion as a soloist which has gained him a portion of notoriety throughout Europe and North America while gaining some attention throughout South America, Australia and parts of Asia.
